TREASON AND CRIMES AGAINST THE EMPEROR AND THE STATE IN THE BYZANTINE JURIDICAL COMPILATIONS

Criminal law is a distinguishing element of Byzantine law\(^1\). The historiography has largely underlined its harshness, because of the considerable presence of physical mutilations and punishments within it\(^2\).

If these punishments are considered to be very severe, on the other hand it must be remarked that in several cases they were utilized to substitute the death penalty provided by the Justinian legislation. Indeed, a strong oriental influence for the presence of the infliction of corporal punishments and mutilations cannot be denied\textsuperscript{3}, but criminal repression was generally mitigated in comparison with the \textit{Digest}, although in Byzantine law the death penalty was still extensively imposed\textsuperscript{4}. In this sense, the authors of the \textit{Ekloge} underlined this philanthropic turn in the proem\textsuperscript{5}, considering it a mitigation of Roman law\textsuperscript{6}, of which the Byzantine legislation must be considered the evolution. It is well known that in the Byzantine compilations redacted in the 8\textsuperscript{th} and 9\textsuperscript{th} century, a special title deals with penal law, regulating the different aspects of criminal repression. If in the \textit{Ekloge}, the 17\textsuperscript{th} title was composed of 54 chapters, both in the \textit{Prochiron} and the \textit{Eisagoge}, the number was augmented: the 39\textsuperscript{th} title of the \textit{Prochiron} contained 86 chapters, whereas the number was extended to 93 chapters in the 40\textsuperscript{th} chapter of the \textit{Eisagoge}. In all three juridical compilations, the title about penal law

---

\begin{flushright}
\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{3} B. Sinogowitz, \textit{Studien zum Strafrecht der Ekloge}, Πραγματεία τῆς Ακαδημίας Ἀθηνῶν, 21, Athens 1956, 16 ff.
\textsuperscript{4} Ibidem, 37-39.
\textsuperscript{5} “ἐπιδιόρθωσις εἰς τὸ φιλανθωπότερον”.
\end{footnotesize}
\end{flushright}
doesn’t have any systematic order, with the result that the arrangement is extremely irregular.

The article focuses on the contents of the official juridical compilations redacted in the 8th and 9th century - thus Ekloge, Prochiron (and Eisagoge) and the Basilika, regarding treason, conspiracy against the emperor and against the state, desertion, relations and cooperation with the enemy, giving information, furnishing materials and arms and giving instructions in the art of ship-building. The texts concerned were extracted from the summae, the paraphrases and the commentaries on the four parts of the Corpus iuris, written by the antecessores in Greek language between the second half of the 6th and 7th century. First of all, the Isauric Ekloge which was promulgated by the imperial authority in 741. Only in the second half of the 9th century the Ekloge was considered as a corrupted Roman law, because it had been enacted and utilised during the reign of the iconoclast dynasty, and for that reason it was replaced with the Macedonian “purification of the ancient law”, which claimed to be a coming back to the 7 In order to facilitate the reading, the German translation of the Ekloge, contained in L. Burgmann’s edition, will be provided in footnotes, as well as the Latin translation of the Prochiron made by K.E. Zachariae von Lingenthal. See: L. BURGMANN, Ecloga. Das Gesetzbuch Leons III. und Konstantinos’ V., Forschungen zur byzantinischen Rechtsgeschichte, X., Frankfurt am Main, 1983; K.E. ZACHARIAE VON LINGENTHAL, Ὁ Πρόχειρος Νόμος, Imperatorum Basilii, Constantini et Leonis Prochiron, Heidelbergae, 1837.

---

pure Justinian law. In the practice it has to be considered an evolution of Roman law, especially after the orientalisation of penal law, which took place in the 7th and 8th century.

For desertion, treason and joining the enemy, no references will be made to the Nomos stratiotikos which is generally considered a private compilation, preserved in discordant versions\(^9\), with considerable differences between them\(^10\). Probably redacted in the 8th century, the Nomos stratiotikos was a code which regulated military life and discipline, composed of excerpts from the Digest and the Codex, whose text was successively expanded first with excerpts “from Rufus and from the Tactica”\(^11\) and later with excerpts extracted from the Ekloge, from the Prochiron and the Eisagogē, and from the Basilika\(^12\). Because of these reasons, the lex militaris will not be considered in the following pages, but on the other hand, the article focuses on the 14th century’s juridical compilations and on the transplantation of Byzantine law in Serbia, where Greek-Roman law became enforced, through the inclusion of the Serbian

---

\(^11\) “ἐκ τοῦ ρουφοῦ καὶ τῶν τακτικῶν”.

\(^12\) W. Ashburner, The Byzantine Mutiny, cit., 82.
version of the Syntagma of Blastares in the tripartite codification enacted by Stephan Dušan in 1349: the Byzantine concepts of high treason and crimes against the state and the emperor, became part of an official legislation, in the first half of the 14th century, which is generally considered the last flourishing period of Byzantine legal history.\(^{13}\)

If this article can only give a short introduction to the juridical sources and their contents, on the other hand it could be a useful starting point to develop further research on a subject, which still remains quite obscure and underinvestigated.

1. The Isaurian ‘selection’

Following the chronological order, we first have to consider the juridical contents of the Ekloge, the Isaurian compilation which defined itself as a “selection of the laws” from the legislation of Justinian the Great, promulgated in 741.\(^{14}\) In the 17th title Ποινάλιος τῶν ἐγκληματικῶν κεφαλαίων, only two chapters are related to the criminal matters previously mentioned, thus the conspiracy against the emperor or the state, and the desertion.\(^{15}\)

\(^{14}\) “Ἐκλογὴ τῶν νόμων […] ἀπὸ τῶν Ἰνστιτούτων, τῶν Διγέστων, τοῦ Κώδικος, τῶν νεαρῶν τοῦ μεγάλου Ἰουστινιανοῦ διατάξεων”.

E. 17.3: Ὁ κατὰ βασιλέως φατριάζων ἢ βουλευόμενος ἢ συνωμοσίας κατ’ αὐτοῦ ἢ τῆς πολιτείας τῶν χριστιανῶν ποιῶν τὸν μὲν τοιούτον ἠμρμοξε κατὰ τὴν ὥραν θανάτοϋσθαι ώς τὴν τοῦ παντὸς κατάλυσων μελετήσαντα. ἂλλ’ ἵνα μὴ τινες καὶ ἐχθρωδῶς πολλάκις διακείμενοι πρὸς τινας ἀκρίτως φονεύσωσιν ἀπολογίαν ἐσχάτως προσφέροντες, ώς κατὰ τῆς βασιλείας ἠλάλησεν, δέον τὸν τοιοῦτον κατὰ τὸν τόπον ὑπὸ στερεὰν παραφυλακὴ γίνεσθαι καὶ τὰ περὶ αὐτοῦ τἀβασιλεῖ ἀναφέρεσθαι καὶ καθὼς λοιπὸν αὐτὸς ἀνακρινεῖ καὶ βουλεύσεται ποιεῖν.

This chapter provided the supreme penalty for conspiracy against the emperor (καθόσιωσις) and for conspiracy against “the state of the Christians” (“τῆς πολιτείας τῶν χριστιανῶν”). The aim of the law was to preserve the imperial throne and the state from any internal attack and from any attempt at subversion. The conspirator against the state or the salus of the emperor was accused of planning the destruction of “the order of reality” (“τὴν τοῦ παντὸς κατάλυσιν μελετήσαντα”) and was condemned to the death penalty.

17 Nov. 95.5.1.

The assumption of the throne by the basileus was decided by God’s will and he was considered the vicar of God, his representative on earth: this concept also favoured the reintroduction of dynastic succession under the Isaurians, after a period characterised by the predominance of a military element (695-717). The legislation itself was no longer decided by the emperor but derived from the will of God, who was the lawgiver, the creator of law and justice and the depositary of imperial legality. By losing the role of ultimate source of the law and becoming an instrument of God, the emperor acquired at the same time “a semi-divine status”: the Ekloge is the first juridical text enunciating this change.

Considering these elements, it can be understood why the crime didn’t have only a secular dimension but also an extra worldly one, and for that reason conspiracy was also considered a violation against God’s will, which had to be repressed with the harshest punishments, inasmuch as the culprit was accused of planning the destruction of all ("ὡς τὴν τοῦ παντὸς κατάλυσιν μελετήσαντα"). The confiscation of the culprit’s goods was not provided in the Ekloge and was only reintroduced in the following century, in the Macedonian juridical compilations, according to Justinianic law. In the second part, the chapter tried to prevent the abuse of the duty to kill a conspirator, by ordering an enquiry if someone accused of fomenting a conspiracy was killed. The results of the enquiry were judged by the emperor in person, who decided on the basis of the reports of his inspectors, if the killer was culpable of homicide or acted in accordance with the law, preserving the safety of the emperor, the state and the order decided by God.

---

20 Ibidem, 77.

Chapter 53 dealt with the crime of the proditio, providing the death penalty for the "αὐτόμολοι".

E. 17.53: Οἱ αὐτόμολοι ἦτοι εἰς τοὺς πολεμίους προστρέχοντες ξίφει τιμωρεῖσθωσαν.

This chapter was related to military desertion, but probably also to the civilians who abandoned the Christian state in order to join the enemy in time of war\textsuperscript{23}. This text was explicit in providing for the supreme penalty with the sword ("\textgreek{ζίφει τιμωρεῖσθωσαν}"). Nevertheless, it cannot be excluded that the same punishment was also imposed in time of peace, for people who abandoned the imperial territory.

---

22 “Deserteure, d. h. diejenigen, die zum Feind überlaufen, sollen mit dem Schwert bestraft werden”. L. Burgmann, Ecloga, cit., 243.

In Byzantine thought, the Byzantine Empire was the only Christian-orthodox state in the whole \textit{oikoumene}: other populations were considered to be pagan or heretical, who had to be converted to the true faith. Consequently, abandoning the imperial army or territory to join the enemy was considered treasonable, in time of war or in time of peace, both for soldiers and for civilians\textsuperscript{24}. These two chapters of the \textit{Ekloge} were extracted from the \textit{Corpus iuris civilis} and if the juridical contents were based on Roman law\textsuperscript{25}, on the other hand, a strong reduction of the texts was made, with the result that they simply regulated the basic aspects of conspiracy, desertion and treason.

2. The Macedonian compilations

The last part of the 9\textsuperscript{th} century was the epoch of the coming back to the Justinianic legislation, or at least it was supposed to be. The imperial \footnotesize\textsuperscript{23} D. 48.4.2.

\footnotesize\textsuperscript{24} D. 49.15.19.8.
\footnotesize\textsuperscript{25} D. 48.4.1.1.
power made an immense effort for the purification of those laws corrupted by the Iconoclast rulers, but the purification was not complete at all, and several aspects remained contaminated by the Iconoclastic legislation. For instance, if in civil law the potestas on children of both parents was abolished and the potestas of the father reintroduced, the penal law remained more corrupted, especially in the two short Macedonian compilations\(^{26}\).

As mentioned before, the 39\(^{th}\) title of the Prochiron and the 40\(^{th}\) title of the Eisagoge, both introduced by the rubric Περὶ ποινῶν (De poenis), regulated several aspects of the criminal law, such as homicide, rape, heresies, theft, arson etc, etc… The crimes of treason, desertion, cooperation with the enemy and revealing military secrets and plans, were more extensively regulated in comparison with the Ekloge. The texts of the Prochiron and the Eisagoge are very similar, with only a few minor differences between them, which cannot be considered relevant in the juridical analysis, and because of this similarity, they can be analysed together.

In both compilations, the first chapter (Proch. 39.1 / Eisag. 40.1) dealt with encouraging the enemy into bringing war against the Byzantine state (“Ἢ ἐρεθίζων τοὺς πολεμίους”) and with favouring the joining of the enemy (“παραδιδοὺς πολεμίους ῥωμαίους”).

Proch. 39.1: Ὅ ἐρεθίζων τοὺς πολεμίους ἢ παραδιδοὺς πολεμίους ῥωμαίους κεφαλικῶς κολάζεται. 27 28

Both crimes were punished with the death penalty: in Byzantine law the term κεφαλικῶς indicated the supreme penalty and it could not be considered to be the loss of status, that is to say the capitis deminutio, provided in Roman law.

Proch. 39.3 (Eisag. 40.3) authorised the killing of the soldiers who abandoned the imperial divisions, thereby joining the enemy:

Proch. 39.3: Τοὺς ἐκ τῶν ῥωμαϊκῶν πρὸς τοὺς πολεμίους ἀποφεύγοντας ὡς πολεμίους ἔξεστιν ἀκινδύνως φονεύειν. 29 30

Those among the Romans (“ἐκ τῶν ῥωμαϊκῶν”)31, who ran away (Τοὺς [...] ἀποφεύγοντας”) to join the enemies

---

27 Proch. 39.1: “Qui hostes proritat, aut hostibus romanos prodit, capitaliter punitur”.
28 See also Eisag. 40.1.
29 Proch. 39.3: “Qui ex romanis ad hostes transfugiunt, eos ut hostes cuique sine periculo occidere licet”.
30 See also Eisag. 40.3.
31 The term μέρος was also used to indicate a division of the army. W. TREATGOLD, Byzantium and Its Army 284-1081, Stanford 1995, 93-98.
(“πολεμίους”), could be killed without any juridical consequences (“ἀκινδύνως”). Furthermore, deserters and traitors were considered to be at the same level as the enemy that they joined:

Proch. 39.19: Oι πολέμιοι καὶ οἱ πρὸς αὐτοὺς αὐτομολοῦντες ξίφει τιμωρεῖσθωσαν

Proch. 39.19 (Eisag. 40.22) was connected with Proch 39.3 (Eisag. 40.3): the deserters who joined the enemy (“πρὸς αὐτοὺς αὐτομολοῦντες”) could have been killed “like the enemies” (“ὡς πολεμίους”) without any juridical consequences, and the death penalty with the sword was inflicted. These chapters had been extracted and translated from the 8th title of the 48th book of the Digest, Ad legem Iuliam maiestatis, and from D. 49.15, De re militari: they were related to every citizen and soldier in the territory of the Eastern Roman Empire and as a consequence of that, every civilian was punished for treason like a soldier, without any distinction being made from those men serving in the army.

---

32 Proch. 39.19: “Hostes, quique ad eos transfugiunt, gladio feriuntor”.
33 See also Eisag. 40.22.
34 The death penalty with the sword was also provided in E. 17.3.
35 The legislation was probably connected with the administrative and military system of the themata, which was adopted since the 7th century and reached its height in the 9th and 10th century, when the Macedonian legislation was promulgated.
Selling arms or furnishing materials to forge or fabricate them was also repressed by means of the death penalty:

Proch. 39.9: Μηδεὶς πιπρασκέτω βαρβάροις ὀπλα εἰργασμένα ἢ ἀνέργαστα ἢ σίδηρον, ἔπει κεφαλικῶς τιμωρεῖται.\(^{36}\)\(^{37}\)

The text was based on D. 39.4.11 pr.\(^{38}\), C. 4.41.2 pr. and C. 4.41.2.1\(^{39}\). In the Prochiron and in the Eisagoge, the term “barbarians” was used\(^{40}\) to indicate the populations to whom materials and weapons were sold, and was literally translated according to the use made in the texts of the Corpus iuris civilis. In the 9th century, however, the context was different and the word was probably used in relation to any enemy or any population outside the territory of the Byzantine Empire, certainly to indicate the people not belonging to the Orthodox faith. According to the text of the Digest and of the Codex, the juridical expression indicating the poena capitis was translated as “κεφαλικῶς τιμωρεῖται.

Proch. 39.38 / Eisag. 40.40\(^{41}\) dealt with the crime of giving instruction in the art of ship

\(^{36}\) Proch. 39.9: “Nemo barbaris arma facta vel infecta aut ferrum vendat, quandoquidem capite punitur”.

\(^{37}\) See also: Eisag. 40.11.

\(^{38}\) D. 39.4.11.

\(^{39}\) C. 4.41.2.1.

\(^{40}\) “βαρβάροις”.

\(^{41}\) See also: B. 60.51.40.
building. The text was extracted from C. 9.47.25\(^{42}\) and provided the death penalty for someone who instructed the “barbarians” in building ships:

Proch. 39.38: \(\text{	extquoteright}Ο\) διδάσκων \(τούς\) βαρβάρους ναῦς κατασκευάζειν, κεφαλικὴ τιμωρία υπόκειται\(^{43} \) \(^{44}\).

Selling or revealing naval technology to the enemy was harshly repressed with the infliction of the \textit{supplicium capitale} for the culprit (“κεφαλικὴ τιμωρία υπόκειται”). Also in this chapter, the term “barbarians”\(^{45}\) was used to translate the term of the \textit{Codex}, with the general meaning of people living outside the Christian empire, or enemies. The ones who deserted and revealed military plans or information to the enemy were condemned to be hanged at stake or burned:

Proch. 39.17: \(Ο\)ἱ πρὸς τοὺς πολεμίους αὐτομολοῦντες καὶ τὰς ἡμετέρας βουλὰς ἐπαγγέλλοντες εἰς φοῦρκαν ἀναρτῶνται ἢ καίονται\(^{46} \) \(^{47}\).

\(^{42}\) C. 9.47.25.
\(^{43} \) Proch. 39.38: “\textit{Qui barbaros docet conficere naves, capitali poenae subiacet}”.
\(^{44} \) See also Eisag. 40.40.
\(^{45} \) “\(τούς\) βαρβάρους”.
\(^{46} \) Proch. 39.17: “\textit{Qui ad hostes transfugiunt et consilia nostra deferunt, in furcam tolluntur aut crematur}”.
\(^{47} \) See also Eisag. 40.20.
In this case, the death penalty was not inflicted with the sword, but through particular methods, such as hanging or burning, probably because of the gravity of this crime, which was considered a serious menace to the safety of the state and its armies. Both in the Prochiron and in the Eisagoge, only one chapter was related stricto sensu to the crimen maiestatis, repressing the conspiracy against the safety of the emperor ("σωτηρίας τοῦ βασιλέως"):

Proch. 39.10: Ὅ κατὰ τῆς σωτηρίας τοῦ βασιλέως μελετήσας, φονεύεται καὶ δημεύεται48

If in Roman law the crimen maiestatis, intended like any conspiracy or attack to the person of the emperor, had a broad scope, both in the Prochiron and in the Eisagoge, the law concerning this crime was even shorter than the one of the Ekloge. The salus of the basileus was not equalised to the salus of the state, but the crime was obviously repressed trough the death penalty and according to Roman law, the culprit was also subjected to accessory sanction of the confiscation of his goods ("δημεύεται").

With the Ἀνακάθαρσις τῶν παλαιῶν νόμων and the return to the true law of Justinian, the 48 Proch. 39.10: "Qui contra principis salutem quid meditatur, confiscatus morte punitur".

49 See also Eisag. 40.12.
laws about treason, desertion and conspiracy against the emperor were reincorporated in the 36th title of the 60th book of the Basilika, rubricated as Νόμος Ιουλίου ὁμόζων κατὰ τῶν ἐπιβούλων. If the majority of the chapters was included in B. 60.36, being their texts based on D. 48.4.1-11 and C. 9.8.1-5, it must be remarked that some chapters were included in different titles or books. The text dealing with the killing of deserters and traitors who joined the enemy was incorporated in B. 60.39.3, rubricated as Νόμος Κορνέλιος περὶ φονευτῶν, καὶ φαρμακῶν, καὶ μαθηματικῶν, καὶ ὁμοίων, according to the Digest's collocation.

Proch 39.38 / Eisag. 40.40, on how to give instruction in the art of ship building was included in B. 60.51.62.

The law about selling weapons, materials or iron to the enemy, was not included in the 60th book, but in the first title of the 19th book of the Basilika (B. 19.1.87), which dealt with contracts of buying and selling and the agreements between the emptor and venditor. The supreme penalty was provided for the culprit ("κεφαλικῇ ὑποκείσθω

50 B. 60.39.3: “Ὅπουδήποτε τοὺς αὐτομόλους εὑρισκομένους ἔξεστιν ὡς πολεμίους φονεύειν”. See also: D. 48.8.3.6 - Proch. 39.3 - Eisag. 40.3.
51 Rubricated as Περὶ ποινῶν.
52 B. 60.51.62: “Ὁ τοὺς βαρβάρους ναῦς κατασκευάζειν διδάσκων κεφαλικῇ τιμορίᾳ ὑπόκειται” (“Qui barbaros docuerit extruere naves, capitali poena tenetur”). See also: C. 9.47.25 - Proch 39.38 - Eisag. 40.40.
τιμωρία”), together with the accessory penalty of bonorum publicatio (“δήμευσις”), according to the text of the Digest\textsuperscript{53}.

Not all of the excerpts of the Prochiron and the Eisagoge were included in the Basilika, because the aim of the authors of the anakatharsis ton palaion nomon was to return to the original Justinianic legislation, but in spite of the attempt to purify the law which had been corrupted by the Iconoclastic legislators, several texts extracted from the two Macedonian compilations, deviating from the Corpus iuris civilis, found a place in the Basilika\textsuperscript{54}.

3. The late juridical compilations

The chapters above mentioned were included in the Hexabiblos of Armenopoulos and in Blastaeres’ Syntagma, which were not official juridical compilations with the force of law, but which can be considered very relevant in Byzantine legal history, not only for their juridical contents, but also because of their diffusion and use in the Ottoman Empire after the collapse of the Eastern Roman Empire, as well as in different countries

\textsuperscript{53} B. 19.1.87: “Μηδεὶς βαρβάροις προφάσει προσβείας παραγενομένοις δόλα πιπρασκέτω ή εἰργασμένα ή ἀνέργαστα, μηδὲ σίδερον ὅλως. ὁ δὲ παρὰ ταῦτα ποιήσας τὶ δημευέσθω, καὶ κεφαλῆς ὑποκείσθω τιμωρία” (“Nemo barbaris sub specie legationis venientibus arma vendat vel facta vel infecta, neque ferrum omnino. Qui contra ea aliquid fecerit, eius bona publicantor, et ipse capitali supplicio subicitor”). See: C. 4.41.2 - Proch. 39.10 - Eisag. 40.11.
\textsuperscript{54} Proch. 39.35,43-44, 66,70.
of Eastern Europe, such as Romania, Russia, Bulgaria, but also in Georgia.

According to byzantine tradition, the last book of the Hexabiblos of Konstantinos Armenopoulos contained penal law. The 8th title of the 6th book (Arm. 6.8.1-3,5-6) grouped these crimes under the rubric Περὶ αὐτομολῶν καὶ ἀνδραποδιστῶν, including the chapters extracted from Proch. 39.3,17,19,1,38,22, which were joined with an excerpt from the Synopsis Basilicorum 60.1.36 (about the plagiarii). One text on the insult against the emperor and another one about the conspiracy against his person (extracted from Proch. 39.10), together with a chapter on exciting the sedition of soldiers (B. 57.1.9) were included in the 14th title of the last book (Arm. 6.14.1-2, 6), Περὶ διαφορῶν ποινῶν.

More relevant is the inclusion in the Σύνταγμα κατὰ στοιχεῖον of Matthew Blastares, a nomokanon alphabetically arranged, redacted like a juridical encyclopedia in 1334-1335: the laws regulating a specific subject were included in a chapter (κεφάλαιον), which was introduced by a 55 Proch. 39.3,17,19,1,38,22 - Arm. 6.8.1-3, 5-6 (about the plagiarii: Arm. 6.8.7 - Bas. 60.1.36).

56 As mentioned, this last chapter dealt with selling free men as slaves (plagium), providing the beating and the cutting of the hair together with the cutting of the hand for the plagiarius.

57 Arm. 6.14.2 - Proch. 39.10; Arm. 6.14.6 - B. 57.1.9.

58 The title Περὶ διαφορῶν ποινῶν regulates several different aspects of penal law.

rubric. The rubrics of the Syntagma give a systematic classification and definition for the juridical contents, which are more practical for the consultation and understandable. The texts about people who joined the enemy are grouped in the chapter Π - ΠA Περὶ προδοτῶν (De proditoribus), composed of the texts of Proch. 39.1 / Eisag 40.1, Proch. 39.3 / Eisag. 40.3, Proch 39.10 / Eisag. 40.12, and Proch. 39.17 / Eisag. 40.20.

Between the text of Proch. 39.1 / Eisag 40.1 and Proch. 39.3 / Eisag. 40.3, Blastares included an excerpt which is not possible to find, either in the Eisagoge, or in the Prochiron, or in the Basilika. This chapter approximated to the status of enemy people helping latrones in pursuing their activities, providing a harsher penalty (“μᾶλλον κολάζονται”) as a consequence of the fact that these activities were considered more dangerous (“χαλεπωτέρα”) than an open conflict:

ΚΑ΄ Περὶ προδοτῶν: [...] ᪐ι δὲ κατὰ χέρσουν ἢ θάλασσαν τοῖς ληστεύουσι συλλητέσαντες, τῶν φανερῶν πολεμίων μᾶλλον κολάζονται, ὅσο

60 The text of every chapter was composed by canon law, followed by civil law, introduced by the terms νόμος, νόμοι, νόμοι πολιτικοί. P. Angelini, Estratti di diritto giustinianeo nel Σύνταγμα κατὰ στοιχεῖον di Matteo Blastares, Tijdschrift voor Rechtsgeschiedenis, 81 (2013), v. 1, 131 – 143.

61 K-KΓ’ Περὶ κλοπῆς (De furto) contained also laws about the latrones (Περὶ λῃστῶν). Their activities were generally repressed with the death penalty. In this sense it must be remarked that giving help to them was equalized to the proditio. See: J. P. Migne (ed.), Patrologia graeca, Paris 1863, v. 144 , col. 1375.
Furthermore, sacrilege was equalised to the crime of lèse majesté in the chapter \textit{I-A' Περὶ ἱερῶν σκευῶν καὶ ἱεροσυλίας}\textsuperscript{63} and, according to the chapter \textit{B-Z' Ὅτι βασιλέα ύβρίζειν οὐ δεῖ, laesa maestas} was repressed through the death penalty with the sword, as for the crime of conspiracy:

\textit{B-Z' Ὅτι βασιλέα ύβρίζειν οὐ δεῖ: [...] Ὅ τα καθοσίωσιν πλημμελῶν, ἦτοι φατριάζων κατὰ βασιλέως ζῷῳ τιμωρεῖσθω [...]}\textsuperscript{64 65}.

This chapter was based on the text of Proch. 39.10 / Eisag. 40.12, but Blastares included the crime of conspiracy (\textit{καθοσίωσις}), which was approximated to that of lèse-majesté. The confiscation of goods was not directly provided in this chapter, contrary to the contents of the \textit{Prochiron} and the \textit{Eisagoge}\textsuperscript{66}, but at the end of the chapter, \textsuperscript{62} For the translation see: J. P. Migne (ed), \textit{Patrologia graeca}, vol. 145, coll. 123, 126: “Qui vero in desertis locis, aut propter mare laetronibus opitulatur, quam hostes aperti eo gravius puniuntur, quo clandestinae insidiae plus periculi ferunt quam apertum bellum”.

\textsuperscript{63} \textit{Σύνταγμα τῶν θείων καὶ ἱερῶν κανόνων}, cit., 307.
\textsuperscript{64} \textit{Ibidem}, 125.
\textsuperscript{65} \textit{PG} 144, op. cit., col. 1114: “Qui laesae majestatis vel coniuratio-nis reus est, gladio puniatur”.
\textsuperscript{66} The \textit{publicatio bonorum} was provided in B. 60.36.19.
the author referred to the contents of Π-ΠΑ΄, which provided the bonorum publicatio.67

People conspiring against the state were also subjected to the lex maiestatis (“τῷ τῆς καθοσιώσεως υποκειται ἐγκλήματι”), like people furnishing help to the enemy with arms, troops, materials, money or in any other way, and people delivering some stronghold to the enemy68:

Σ-ΙΑ΄ Περὶ τῶν συνωμοσίας, ἢ φατρίας, ἢ στάσεις ποιούντων: [...] Ὁ συνωμοσίαν κατὰ τῆς πολιτείας παρασκεμάσα γενέσται [...] ἢ παρασκευάσας αὐτῶς θείηναι πλήθει [...] τῷ τῆς καθοσιώσεως υποκειται ἐγκλήματι [...]69 70.

In 1349, a few years later than the redaction of the Syntagma alphabeticum, its Serbian abridged version was incorporated in the tripartite codification enacted by Stephan Dušan and became law in force in the Serb-byzantine Empire, which had been founded three years before71. The Syntagma was integrally translated into the Slavic language between 1348 and 1349, and later reduced, 67 “Ζήτει καὶ τὸ κα´κεφάλαιον τοῦ Π στοιχείου”.

---

68 See D. 48.4.3.
69 Σύνταγμα τῶν θείων καὶ ἱερῶν κανόνων, cit., 450.
70 PG 145, op. cit., col. 131: “Qui conjugationis adversus remprubicam auctor exstiterit [...] aut eos adjuvari copiis [...] lege majestatis tenetur”.
erasing the majority of canon law, and preserving the νόμοι πολιτικοί (царецизи цакони). The crimes of treason, desertion, cooperation and sharing intelligence with the enemy, unknown to the Slav populations, were introduced in the Serbian juridical system (which had previously been based on customary law) and repressed according to Greek-roman law’s discipline.

The chapter B-Z ’Ὅτι βασιλέα υβρίζειν οὐ δεῖ was included in the chapter ΚΣ. Οπο ταρού πο λοδολατε δισαλιτη, while the chapter ΚΖ. Ο πρεδατελες Ι νενεφρνιτεχχ was composed of the texts of Π-ΚΑ’ Περὶ προδοτῶν and Σ-ΙΑ’ Περὶ τῶν συνωμοσίας, ή φατρίας, ή στάσεις ποιοῦντων.

In some cases, the texts were adapted to the Serbian context:

.ΚΖ. Ο πρεδατελες Ι νενεφρνιτεχχ

“Иже отъ православныхъ къ ратниковъ отбѣгшихъ тако же и ратники афте иесть

---

74 Abridged syntagma .ΚΖ. Ibidem, 65.
The latter is the translation of the chapter extracted from Proch 39.3 (Eisag. 40.3) and included by Blastares in the integral version. The words “ἐκ τῶν ῥωμαϊκῶν” (“from the Romans”) were translated into the Serbian language as “оть православныхъ” (“from the Orthodox people”), in order to adapt the text to the exigencies of the Serbo-Byzantine Empire, whose population was composed by the Serbian ethnic element and by the Greek ethnic one, which tended to reside in the southern provinces. The Byzantines generally referred to themselves with the term Romans (Ῥωμαῖοι), which was also preserved in the Byzantine juridical compilations, and as a consequence of that, it was necessary to change the text, to include the Slavic part of the population living in the northern part of the empire. It must be remarked that the crime of небьра (treason) was introduced in the Serbo-Byzantine empire, and the chapters of the Code of Dušan 1349-1354 were closely connected with the definition and the general discipline provided in the 75 Ibidem, 64.

76 Π-ΚΑ’ Περὶ προδοτῶν: Τοὺς ἐκ τῶν ῥωμαϊκῶν τοὺς πολεμίους ἀποφεύγοντας ὡς πολεμίους ἔξεστιν ἀκινδύνως φονεύειν.
77 Proch 39.3 - Eisag. 40.3 - Syntagma of Blastares Π-ΚΑ’- Abridged Syntagma .Κ3.
78 The term Orthodox believers was also used in the other texts included in the Abridged syntagma, instead of the term Romans.
Abridged syntagma\footnote{See: Code of Dušan 1349-1354, § 52, rubricated as \textit{O nevěťk} (About treason). Treason was exclusively under the jurisdiction of the emperor, together with homicide and rape, § 192: “\textit{За при работе: За невěťку и за кровь и за разъем владическы да идьше прѣй цар}” (“For three things, for treason, for blood, and for rape, of a noblewoman, let them come before the Tsar”). For the English translation, see: M. BURR, The code of Stefan Dušan Tsar and Autocrator of the Serbs and Greek, The Slavonic and East European Review, 28 (1949), v. 70, 198-217; The Slavonic and East European Review, 28 (1950), v. 71, 516-539.}, which gave the strength of law to Byzantine law in Serbia.

4. Byzantine law as evolution and vulgarization of Roman law

If in Roman law the majority of these crimes was generally grouped under the \textit{Lex iulia maiestatis}, in the Byzantine compilations, they were divided into different chapters and so it is not possible to group them under the concept of \textit{crimen maiestatis}. Penal matters were no longer tied to procedure, and in this sense Byzantine law seems to be differently configured, much more based on the concept of crime itself.

Furthermore, both in the \textit{Prochiron} and the \textit{Eisagoge}, only one chapter dealt directly with the \textit{crimen maiestatis} (Proch. 39.13 / Eisag. 40.12), that is the conspiracy against the emperor, as well as in the \textit{Ekloge} (§ 17.3), but in the latter the conspiracy against the \textit{salus} of the emperor was assimilated to the conspiracy against the safety of the state. In the Basilika the chapters were regrouped, according to Roman law, in the Νόμος Ἰουλίου ἀρμόζων κατὰ τῶν ἐπιβούλων, which was based on the Lex Iulia de maiestate.

If we tried to show how Byzantine criminal law about treason and crimes against the state and emperor is connected with the Corpus iuris civilis, whose has to be considered an evolution, it must also be considered a deviation from Roman criminal law, as well as a vulgarisation, because of the massive infliction of the physical mutilations and punishments. The fact that in a large number of cases, especially for the above-mentioned crimes, the supreme penalty was provided instead of the confiscation of goods could be a supporting element for the historiographic theories which consider Byzantine law to represent a decline of postclassical Roman law. On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that, the supreme penalty more often stipulated by the legislation of Justinian was replaced by physical punishments and mutilations, thereby making Greek-Roman law a mitigation.

These still obscure matters, like treason, crimes against the emperor and the state, should be more deeply investigated by the scholars who intend to approach these aspects of Greek-roman criminal legislation, and shed light on how it was applied in the practice in the Eastern-Roman Empire.
ABSTRACT

The articles focuses on Byzantine criminal law, in particular on treason and crimes against the emperor and the state, desertion, relations and cooperation with the enemy, giving information, furnishing materials and arms and giving instructions in the art of ship-building.

In the 6th century the four parts of the Corpus iuris civilis were translated into Greek language and Roman law and included in the Byzantine juridical compilations, which were redacted between the 8th and 9th century, thus the Ekloge, Prochiron, Basilika and the Eisagoge.

Byzantine law must be considered the evolution of Roman law: in particular, penal law was vulgarised through the introduction of physical mutilations and punishments, and through the massive infliction of the death penalty. The crimes against the basileus and the state were considered a crime against the will of God, so they had to be repressed in the harshest way, through the imposition of the poena capitis.

Byzantine law was received among the Slav populations: in particular in Serbia, where the above mentioned crimes were included in the legislation of Stephan Dušan, who founded the Serbo-Greek Empire in the 14th century. In that way Greek–Roman law, translated into Serbian language, obtained the strength of law, in the last part of the Middle Age. The article is an introductory study on the sources and on the juridical contents of a still underinvestigated subject.

Keywords: treason, crimes against state and emperor, Greek-Roman law, reception Serbia.

DR. PAOLO ANGELINI
Research fellow (FWO)
Division for Roman law and legal history, Faculty of law, KU Leuven Sint Michielsstraat 6, 3000 Leuven, Belgium paolo.angelini@law.kuleuven.be